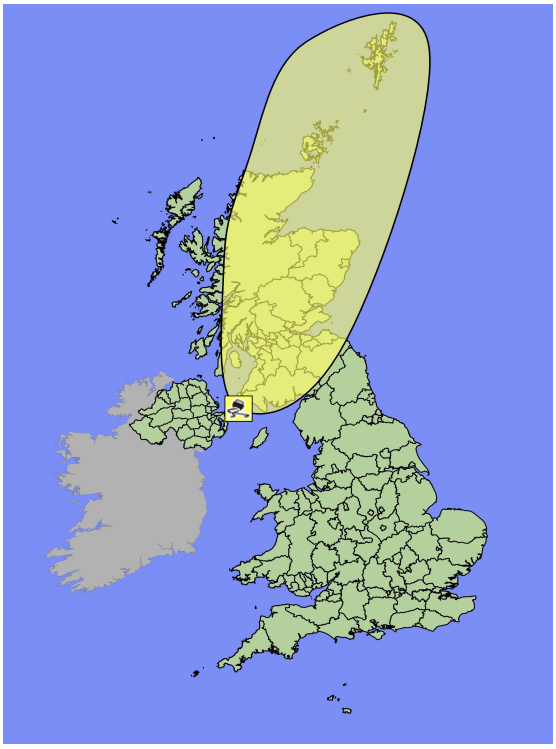
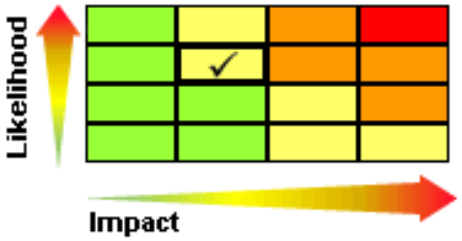
National Severe Weather Warning Service





Chief Forecasters Assessment
After a cold start on Friday morning some outbreaks of rain, with sleet or snow in places, are likely to spread from the west, mainly affecting southern and central Scotland. This will fall onto frozen roads, increasing the risk of ice. Some snowfalls are also possible, mainly on higher ground where several centimeters may accumulate in places. The timing and location of any rain, sleet or snow is very uncertain at this time although confidence is higher that amounts will be generally small with the main risk being the formation of icy patches. As the rain and snow clear on Friday evening, another sharp frost will develop again.

The Met Office have issued a Yellow Warning of Ice

Valid from 00:05 on Fri, 30th Nov 2012 until 23:59 on Fri, 30th Nov 2012

A combination of low temperatures and a mix of rain, sleet and snow will lead to the risk of icy patches forming on untreated surfaces on Friday.

The public should be aware of the risk of ice.
